US gas heading into two strong years while coal languishes – EIA

Natural gas has likely entered a historic period, with upstream supply and downstream demand to exceed all record highs this and next year, while the coal sector wanes on both counts, according to the government-backed Energy Information Administration (EIA).

In the influential body's latest widely watched short-term energy forecast extending to 2019, dry gas output from wells across the country will more than recover from a dip in 2017 and surge to averages of...
