UK market liberalisation: lost in transmission

Part one of this two-part series examined why the government is introducing a price cap on domestic tariffs, while it considers yet another fundamental shake-up of energy markets, along with Helm's proposals for the generation sector of the value chain. Here, we consider what Helm has proposed for transmission and distribution, and retail supply – and why some integrated oil and gas companies are choosing to move into the energy utility sector, one they have previously tended to avoid.
