Top stories: Senior rank changes at Shell, Stade gets FID, Tellurian explores sale

The CeraWeek conference in Houston grabbed a chunk of top afternoon headlines this week as delegates convened each day to take soundings, and express disagreement at world developments, ranging from the Biden LNG pause to the pressing deadlines looming over the 2050 net zero goals.

On the home front, Gas Matters Today had a few more special nuggets: an analyst indicated the potential that Namibia may be better on the gas front than Guyana. A Genser VP also told us about the challenging lending environment in Africa; separately, Ana Maria Jaller-Makarewicz, lead energy analyst at the Institute for Energy Economics and Financial Analysis, warned Europe's heavy leaning on LNG could prove costly.

In other developments, Tellurian informed the market of its decision to explore a sale, and Shell installed 30-year-veteran as EVP on the back of Steve Hill's departure — here's your catchup service for the top headlines this week:
