Facing market realities: what will become of projects struggling to take FID?

In our recent article, Market realities bite as new projects struggle to secure buyers, we highlighted one of the main features of the LNG market today – namely the very large amount of planned capacity which is chasing a limited amount of market growth. In this article we look at the possible outcomes of this process – which types of projects might go ahead and which are likely to be left standing in the queue for final investment decision (FID) for a substantial period of time, or, indeed, never reach FID at all.
