Is Algeria's LNG business heading the way of Egypt's?

Algerian LNG output is now less than 50% of the capacity of its liquefaction plants. Its exports are being squeezed between falling natural gas production and growing domestic demand, leading to fears that it may eventually succumb to the "Egypt syndrome". In the second of our series on the established Atlantic Basin suppliers, we examine the challenges facing Algeria as it struggles to maintain its position as a major LNG supplier.
