US LNG exports – The importance of location for second wave projects

As the US prepares to export major volumes of LNG through five new projects, the first of which started up this year, a second wave of US LNG export projects is being planned. All US projects share similarities. Yet sponsors of the second tranche of US projects tend to seek commercial, technological, geographic and other points of differentiation. This article considers how a proposed US project's location can have implications for its ability to reach FID.
